THE Kind of RIGHT GIRL

FREDDIE WAS NOT only unhappy, he was hurt! Carole had hurt him. Right after the notice had been pinned up on the bulletin board, Freddie had rushed to find Carole and had blurted his invitation, "Dance on Saturday. Will you go with me, Carole?"

Carole, being blonde and very pretty, had looked at him witheringly. "With you! Well, really, Freddie, if you haven't learned by now that no girl wants to go to a dance with a boy who falls all over himself..." She hadn't even bothered to finish the insult. Later, Freddie had seen her with some other girls, giggling like mad and pointing at him.

"They're laughing at me. She's told them," he brooded. So miserable was he, that it never occurred to him that Carole had been downright mean and cruel. All he could think of was that he had two left feet and tripped all over them.

He brooded and thought until he felt lower than low and then, at the very bottom of the pit of despair, he found an idea. Why not learn to dance? Take lessons? Sure, that was it! The only thing was to do it in secret. He didn't want to be laughed at or made fun of any more than he had been.

So Freddie consulted the phone directory of the nearest town and there it was! "Learn to dance...fifty cents a lesson!" And there was a bus leaving for Cartertown in the next five minutes!

The address was not at all what Freddie had expected, for it was just an ordinary house like the one he lived in. No sign outside or anything. And the dancing teacher was a surprise, too.

"My name's Jane Hollis," she said. "I'm just trying to make some extra money after school. Come on in."

Jane was a bit younger than Freddie and not half so glamorous as golden-haired Carole. But somehow, Freddie found himself looking into her brown eyes and telling her the entire story. And she really did look very pretty when her eyes flashed indignantly and she said, "We'll make a swell dancer out of you!"

The lesson went very well. Freddie and Jane had a lot to talk and laugh about and dancing didn't seem to be so hard when a pretty girl kept smiling at you and saying, "Hey, you're getting good!" All that week, Freddie kept taking the bus to Cartertown and learning how to dance.

He'd had lots of lessons by the time Saturday and the dance came around. The gym was fixed up with lanterns and ribbons and Carole was the prettiest girl there. "Save the next dance for me?" Freddie asked her.

"Sorry," she said and you could tell she wasn't at all sorry. "All my dances are taken!" She looked at Freddie to see how miserable she'd made him, but to her astonishment, he wasn't looking at her! He was half-way across the floor, smiling at a girl she'd never seen before! Just an average girl with brown eyes.

The music started and the girl slipped into Freddie's arms. Carole felt her mouth drop open as she watched Freddie and the girl glide smoothly across the floor. Couple after couple stopped dancing to watch them. And when the music stopped, there was applause and the handleader took a silver cup from a table and gave it to Freddie and the girl!

"It's really Jane's!" Freddie said proudly. "A loving cup to...the right kind of girl!" As he and Jane danced past her, Carole felt suddenly ashamed of herself. She'd been the wrong kind of girl. Maybe she needed lessons, too!

Romantic YARN

AS LINDA SUE sat lost in thought, her knitting needles moving in rhythm to the wheels of the bus, she had no idea how adorable she looked. From under her fuzzy pink angora tam, her brown curls clustered thickly, falling almost to her shoulders. Her neat little figure, clad in a Scotch plaid suit, looked trim. And her hands worked busily away at the scarf she was knitting for her dad.

But Linda Sue was thinking neither of her appearance nor of her knitting. She was thinking, worrying, in fact, about something vitally important.

"Billy hasn't asked me yet and I don't believe he's going to!" she said to herself. "Not after I refused to go to the movies with him three times in a row! And Bob wants to ask me, but can't on account of that cousin of his who's visiting in town. He's just got to ask her! And I just know Pete's going to ask me tonight, but I'd die rather than go to the dance with him. He's so dumb!"

Linda Sue almost dropped a stitch at the mere idea of not going to the dance at all! Why, she always went to the school dances and besides, she had a dreamy new dress to wear! Blue net with a matching stole of lace!

"Imagine," she thought bitterly, "having a dress and no date! What'll I do if no one asks me?"

That thought was so horrible, that Linda Sue did drop a stitch. In fact, she dropped the entire ball of yarn, which rolled right out of her knitting bag and along the floor of the bus.

"Oh, gosh!" Linda Sue said to herself.

And then, "Oh, gosh!" she said aloud.

"I'm terribly sorry!" She blushed as she stooped to free the yarn from around the feet of a quite goodlooking boy. He blushed as he stooped to help her. Both of them blushed as their hands touched, accidentally, of course!

"I...I'm afraid I can't disentangle you," said Linda Sue.

"Guess I'll have to get off the bus and come home with you, then," laughed the boy. "That is, if you want the yarn and...don't mind!"

Linda Sue blushed again. "He's probably a good dancer," she thought. Aloud she said, "I don't mind...I don't mind at all!"
